San Luis Mexquitic was officially founded on November 3, 1592, by the Spanish, although a settlement of Huachichil and Tlaxcalan Indians called Mexquitic already existed, and silver mines had been exploited by the Spanish since 1522. Later, it was named Villa de San Luis Potosí, adding the word Potosí to compare its mineral wealth to that of Potosí in Bolivia. The exploitation of the mines led to the development of a significant population center and the construction of stately buildings that still stand today. Combined with its location, connecting the south and center of the country with the north, and its proximity to the Gulf of Mexico, San Luis became an important distribution center for products arriving at the Gulf ports.

In the second half of the 19th century, the city was a key location in national events:

On May 31, 1863, President Juárez, unable to remain in Mexico City any longer due to the imminent arrival of the French, marched toward San Luis Potosí, arriving on June 9 and declaring it the capital of the Republic. He remained there until December 22, when he departed for Matehuala to evade the imperialist general Tomás Mejía. Republican forces evacuated San Luis on the night of the 23rd, and although they returned on the 27th to attack, they were defeated. Thus, on January 4, 1864, San Luis proclaimed its allegiance to the Empire. The first French troops to set foot in San Luis Potosí were the brigade of General Armand Alexandre de Castagny, commanding more than a thousand men, on January 13, 1864.

During the imperialists' stay in the city, the conservative newspapers La Restauración, El Correo del Comercio, La Magistratura y la Judicatura del Departamento and El Álbum de las Señoritas Potosinas were published, and in 1865, the satirical illustrated newspaper El Cronicón and the conservative La Razón; the telegraph line from San Luis Potosí to Mexico was inaugurated on January 1, 1866, and the construction of the Cathedral was completed.

In January 1867, the Republican army, under the command of General Mariano Escobedo, entered the city of San Luis Potosí, and President Juárez returned to the city on February 21 of the same year. San Luis Potosí was named the capital of the Republic for the second time. President Juárez was in this city when Maximilian was taken prisoner, and his defenders and some friends came to plead for his release.

In the late 1870s, a series of uprisings erupted in the Huasteca region of San Luis Potosí. The numerous plans proclaimed at that time have been given the generic name of "agrarian communism." The centers of the rebellions were Tamazunchale and Valle del Maíz. From 1879 to 1883, some 3,000 Indigenous people, labeled "anarchists," kept the eastern region of the state in constant agitation. Shouting "Land for the farmer," they attacked the properties of the state governor and other large landowners. Also in 1879, the Indigenous man Juan Santiago took up arms demanding the restitution of lands for communities holding ancient titles; the revolt was suppressed in August of that year. Almost simultaneously, another rebel movement was promoted by the Socialist Directorate, whose program proposed the enactment of an agrarian law and the creation of a democratic and social republic.

In late 1880, the indigenous leader Juan Santiago initiated a second agrarian revolt in the state of San Luis Potosí, the culmination of those that had arisen in San Antonio, Tanlajás, Tancanhuitz, Aquismón, San Vicente, and Tamapatz, attributed to the abuses committed by government agents against the indigenous populations. In 1883, in Ciudad del Maíz, Father Mauricio Zavala called for an agrarian revolution from the pulpit. Once the dissenters were subdued, the fragmentation of community lands facilitated their concentration by large landowners.

By the end of the 19th century, San Luis continued to be an important crossroads of major land transportation routes, mining diversified, and trade expanded.

Today, the city is a very important industrial center for the country, and its historic center was declared a UNESCO World Heritage Site in 2022.
